Tips for Finding Scholarships

- Start early! Your junior or even sophomore year is not too soon to begin checking out scholarship possibilities.
- Make a commitment to the search. Finding and applying for scholarships takes time and effort, but it can really pay off. At the very least, conducting your own search will save you from paying a scholarship search firm to do it. Be thorough. Methodically access all the resources you can find—the Internet, local libraries, college financial aid offices, guidance counselors, local civic and business organizations, your employer, and your parents' employer.
- Look for scholarships that fit your academic interests/achievements, creative arts/performance talents, special achievements/activities (like community service and leadership), and special characteristics (including things from your parent's profession to your ethnic background to being a first-generation college student).
